

Please do not allow cellular telephone use aboard airborne aircraft. We are already inundated enough with people's conversations in virtually every public place but, in most cases, we can at least move away from the distraction. Moving away from the distraction in an airplane is not possible and since most people do not observe any form of phone etiquette, I can conceive of a coast to coast flight with several people talking at once in loud voices. This has the potential to create "airplane rage" situations, similar to road rage, especially when alcohol is added to the mix.

There is simply no reason why people, including business travelers, can't go without using their telephone for a few hours.
